Tuten's .Lever Brothers sugar was imported directly from Mexico in large amounts. Sugar imported from the Dominican Republic, in contrast, was exported mostly to other Caribbean countries such as Cuba. Cuba in turn would often send its surplus sugar to other Caribbean countries. Labor Many Cubans working in sugar production had either little or no access to safe drinking water or to other sanitary and health conditions and thus remained susceptible to a number of communicable diseases. Political climate The revolutionary government in Cuba had established land reform by the mid-1930s, and around 541,000 tenants were able to buy their first plots of land. These landless Cuban workers were then given small plots to cultivate, in exchange for their labor. However, landless Cuban laborers were still unable to realize the fruit of their labor, since they were forced to use what little money they had from their meager wages at the hands of corrupt government officials.
